Soviet relations have served as a Farm at Oakley, the gang's hidefair barometer of Khrushchev's authority. When relations with Belgrade were good, he seemed

Riding the Economy Bus

The State Board of Education's action in calling for centralized purchasing of school buses comes as a logical step in Ohio's efforts to scale down governmental costs.

The move, according to State Department of Education estimates, could save Ohio taxpayers up to $1.6 million a year. Under the average apportionment of school bus costs, about one-third of the savings would accrue to local school districts, the rest to the state.

Local districts now draft their own specifications and take their own bids for buses. They're reimbursed by the state for a share of the purchase price.

tendent of public instruction, shows what the centralized purchase plan could mean to Ohio. It shows that Kentucky, which uses centralized purchasing, paid an average $4,780 for each 66-passenger bus in 1963. Ohio's average for the same type of bus

The State Department of Education figures school districts will need about 800 buses this year. If Ohio could chop the per-bus cost to Kentucky's level, it would mean saving of $2,000 per bus or $1.6 million,

The plan still has to be developed in detail by the state board's transportation division and then would require approval by the board and the education department.

With $1.6 million at stake, Ohio shouldn't waste any time in hopping on the economy

Problem Child South of the Border

The Alliance for Progress, hailed at its birth in Punta del Este as an economic wonder that would firm up U.S.-Latin American relations, is now two years old today.

It's doubtful that anyone on either side of the border will mark the anniversary with more than disdain or disillusionment.

Despite a 10-year, $20 billion U.S. nourishment provision, the wonder child is sickly and spoiled.

At the birth ritual two years ago, the United States and 19 Latin nations mapped a fruitful life for the infant alliance. It would, they hoped, bring about broad economic, social and cultural improvements in Latin America.

To date, the growth record is dismal and the parents must share the blame.

CHIEF COMPLAINT from south of the border is that the wonder child has all but choked to death on U.S. red tape and

Although there is some justification for the charge, the Latin nations have done

Defenseless Plan

The Army troop rotation plan that many said would never work when it was instituted last year didn't work.

It flopped militarily and economically and is being scrapped by the Defense Department.

The avowed purpose of the plan was to streamline the Seventh Army in Europe by rotating small units every six months without dependents. No dependents, no distractions from training, theorized the Army.

As it turned out, and as might have been expected, morale suffered, disciplinary problems mounted and the Army found that six months wasn't enough time to train an effective combat force abroad.

The real purpose of the minus-dependents rotation was to try to plug part of the drain on U.S. gold reserves. In theory, overseas spending of American dollars would be cut.

In fact, only minor savings were effected. No one is about to deny that the gold drain is serious. Any weakening of confidence in the America dollar affects everyone. But any weakening of U.S. military readiness abroad is more disturbing. Is the Defense Department justified in subordinating that readiness to toy with an economic little to keep the alliance healthy.

Only 6 of the 19 signing nations-Bolivia, Chile, Colombia, Mexico, Peru and Venezuela -have drafted workable 10-year development plans. Self-help projects and land and tax reforms are lacking in most participating Little of the cash this country has doled out has been used to nurture the alliance program. A $398 million loan and aid package went to Brazil last March and about $84 million of it was used as "walking around" money to bail out the cruzeiro, Brazil's shaky gold monetary unit.

Argentina, second largest country in South America, recorded more bankruptcies last year than at any time in her modern history. Yet even with $150 million credits pledged by the United States, the Argentine government has failed to complete plans for public works and self-help projects estimated to cost $81 million.

Mexico has received $20 million for small farm development but the farmers haven't seen it. Why? Mexican banks through which the money must flow aren't set up to make individual loans.

SO YOU BEGIN to wonder how much good will we're buying or if we're getting anything but headaches in return for the $20 billion pledged to keep the alliance alive.

President Kennedy admitted early this month that he's "depressed" at the lack of progress but wants to keep trying.

But unless the Latinos themselves start showing some regard for the program and until it shows signs of maturing into something better than a freak, Congress would do well to consider a cut in the nourishment.

The Latin American share of the foreign aid bill would be a logical place to start' the weaning.

Good Safety Mark

This record was the result of the combined alertness of motorists and pedestrians alike and it will take the combined vigilance and dedication to traffic safety to keep it. It's certainly worth the effort.

Treaty That Failed By Harry Baehr

Ratification of treaties has been an issue between the president and the Senate since the first Congress under the Constitution. Then Sen. William Maclay growled to his diary that making treaties the law of the land violates the separation of legislative and executive powers and "must be tyranny

While the Senate has often resisted this "tyranny," it has seldom been so effective, or had such an effect upon world history, as when it refused to give a two-thirds majority to the Treaty of Versailles and to the League of Nations which was a part of it.

Many things combined to defeat the treaty and the League-President Woodrow Wilson's own errors prominent among them. The man who is generally conceded to have done most in that direction, however, was Sen. Henry Cabot Lodge, majority leader of a Senate in which the Republicans had a one-vote edge.

Yet Lodge himself approved the League in principle. So did many of the leading Republicans - including former President William Howard Taft, who was prominent in the influential League to Enforce Peace. Polls showed the public generally indorsed a world league; more than 30 state legislatures adopted resolutions favoring it.

DESPITE THIS favorable climate, the United States never joined the League, and wound up signing separate treaties with Germany and the other Central Powers.

So far as the opposition to "Wilson's League" was concerned, this reversal was achieved subtly.

One of President Wilson's biographers, Arthur Walworth, says that Sen. Lodge fol-Arthur Walworth, says that Sen. Lodge followed the advice of former President Theodore Roosevelt (who died before the League fight reached its climax) "never wholly rejecting the idea of a league, but exuding pessimism as to its practicality."

The Massachusetts senator also saw to it that the hearings on the treaty were strung out to inordinate length, and that the final report of the Foreign Affairs Committee embodied, not flat disapproval, but a swarm of reservations that would require considerable renegotiation among the powers and in the meanwhile, the "irreconciliables," the out-and-out isolationists such as Senators Borah, Hiram Johnson and La Follette, spoke against entangling America in the troubles of Europe and Asia.

There were liberals, too, who eventually opposed the treaty, not because of the League but because of the territorial and financial demands made on Germany and its allies, and the land-grabbing tactics of the victors. And Wilson had insisted that treaty and League were inseparable.

This insistence was one of the President's cardinal mistakes in the treaty fight. But there were others:

In January, 1918, he stated American peace aims - the famous Fourteen Points - in an address. The spirit of the points was excellent. They were, however, too general on some subjects and too specific on others to form the basis of a detailed treaty. Yet the Allies accepted them, with reservations; so did the Central Powers when they asked for an armistice.

IN OCTOBER, 1918, Mr. Wilson asked for a Democratic Congress in the forthcoming "would certainly be interpreted on the other side of the water as a repudiation of my

An annoyed electorate gave him an even more annoyed Republican Congress - and his position was correspondingly weakened on both sides of the water.

Nevertheless. Wilson insisted on taking part in the Paris peace conference, although grave doubts were voiced as to both the constitutionality and the practicality of this departure from custom.

Thereby the President became personally entangled in the many disputes to which the treaty gave rise; he was forced to compromise on many issues and more and more tended to throw the weight of evolving a genuine peace upon the unborn league.

Balance of Payments Makes Road Smooth, Rough

WASHINGTON-(NEA) - All the pieces in the papers about the deficit in the U.S. balance of payments and the declining U.S. stocks of gold have a bad psychological effect on most American citizens, even though many them haven't much notion what it's all about.

This is a pretty sophisticated

A short time ago it was said that the only man in the world who really understood international payments was Per Jacobsen of Sweden, managing director of International Monetary Fund.

Bankers, economists, government fiscal experts and some congressmen discuss balance of payment very emotionally. Even so, their language is almost completely unintelligible to lay-

BACK ONE OF THESE authorities into a corner and ask him for a simple explanation. You'll get something 1.

"The balance of payments is an international accounting in summary form for all U.S. international financial transactions. "It includes exports and imeign loans and investments, foreign aid, the cost of keeping Arnerican military forces overseas, their spending and tourist spending abroad, dividend, interest and loan repayments and the movements of gold to balance international accounts."

An average citizen may then ask, "What has all this got to do with me?"

One solid answer is that it affects U.S. jobs and taxes, due to its influence on the value and purchasing power of the dollar. It can influence your mortgage interest rates or time payments

THIS LAST IS AN intricate daisy chain, but it can be followed.

On the day President Kennedy sent his long message to Congress with recommendations to improve the U.S. balance of payments position, the Federal Reserve Board raised the interest rate on its loans to banks from 3 to 3.5 per cent.

It also authorized U.S. banks to raise to 4 per cent the interest rates they charged on short term loans-from 90 days to a year.

WE COME TO THE INTEREST which consumers must pay on their homes and autos.

The rates now average between 6 and 7 per cent. In a tight money market though, when interest rates are going up, the terms may be changed to make up the difference. Down payment requirements could be increased.

Auto loans could be cut from 36 to 30 or even 24 months. Mortgages might be granted for only 25 years instead of 30. The result is larger monthly payments, which hit consumers hard.

The alternative to the complicated balance of payments adjustments could be even worse. Say the United States doesn't raise its short-term interest rates. Then foreign depositors could demand payment in gold-which U.S. depositors can't do-and the

What can the United States do about it?

Peking's propaganda grows more rash daily. It moves troop planes along the Indian border. Does this mean a new invasion? Its puppet, North Korea, engages in border incidents. Will these spread and intensify?

Its ally, North Viet Nam, conrebellion in South Viet Nam. Will Communist influence spread further in Southeast Asia?

These are some of the shortterm worries about the largest and seemingly most irresponsible nation in the world today. But these are not the biggest cause for concern.

For a number of reasons. Washington believes that Peking, despite its bluster, will not seek a serious adventure in the near future, although it will contine its gadfly operations at every possible point.

China is developing its own nuclear weapons and, perhaps 10 or 15 years from now, will have sufficient nuclear capability to do appreciable damage. This is the

A NATION of 700 million, growng rapidly in population, surrounded mostly by weak neighbors, itself isolated and pugnacious, led by unsophisticated men -a nation with these attributes might risk nuclear war to achieve

Both in the Korean War and in domestic development programs, Peking has shown disregard for the lives of its people. The vast expanses of China, and the huge population might make Chinese leaders think their country could absorb nuclear bombardment better than any other nation.

All of this is in the future, and predictions are difficult. Even tentative looks ahead are nearly impossible without an appreciation of current conditions.

China today is a military giant, but a giant enfeebled by malnutrition, rusting weapons and lack of allies. Only in relation to her immediate neighbors (except the Soviet Union) does Red China post an offensive threat. For a defensive war, on the other hand, China could probably repulse any but a nuclear attack.

With a standing army of about 2.6 million plus a militia about 10 times that number, China has the largest ground force in the

The United States, by comparison, has an army of just under 1 million. Peking's air force is respectable in size (about 3,000 planes, mostly jets, and 100,000 The navy is negligible, except for coastal defense and short-haul operations. It consists of 50,000 sailors who man eight destroyers, 25 World War II type submarines and perhaps 250 light patrol boats and landing craft.

BUT NUMBERS mean little. The army is overwhelmingly infantry. The relatively few armored and mechanized units lack modern tanks and trucks. mdern artillery is in short supply, too.

China now has facilities for manufacturing small arms, mortars and ammunition, but, since Russia cut off major military aid, the army is standing still in the technological sense.

The air force is actally shrinking. It has older model Russian MIGs and IL-28 bombers. But it lacks spare parts and the factories to replace entire planes.

The navy faces the same prob-High grade fuel also is scarce.

Without an outside supply, the Chinese forces would run out of gas in any long, large-scale fight. Manpower is another matter. Despite reports of riots and other difficities two and three years ago, the Chinese military today is regarded as generally loyal to the regime and-equally important-well trained. Red China's military posture today is sometimes compared with Russia's just before World War

The comparison may be valid in some respects, but there is at least one major difference. The basic strength of Russia at that time was sufficient to absorb tremendous losses and, with some outide help, to rebuild rapidly. It is doubtful that China has this resiliency.

After a period of astonishing failures, China's agricultural and industrial output today is no higher than it was five years ago. Meanwhile, the population has increased perhaps 30 to 40 million.

Today one might describe the level for food production as permitting survival, with but little to spare. Clearly, the high birth rate necessitates increased autput merely to continue to exist.

THIS EXPLAINS the recent birth control effort. There are even indications that the Chinese soon may impose economic penalties on parents of large families. All of these weaknesses account for the belief among officials here

Where the Rivers Flow

Where does the Detroit River go, after it enters Lake Erie, that is? And the Maumee, Raisin and Huron? Is this age of scientific accomplishment these sound like elemental questions. But they are as yet unaswered according to spokesmen from the Divisions of Geological Survey and Wildlife, agencies in the Ohio Department of Natural Resources

Some years of work with floats have measured only one thingsurface current, which is a fancy name for wind. But the destination of these large bodies of water entering the lake remained an enticing mystery.

The first stage of a synoptic survey to map these water bodies has been completed. Some 600 water samples were collected all over the western end of the lake on the same day. Samples were taken at a five-foot depth and just off bottom. The scientists will attempt to map the water bodies by identifying the different "kinds" of water. Tests which were run included conductivity, turbidity, acidity and or alkalinity and temperature readings. Four boats and crews were out simultaneousiy.

Fisheries biologists are interested in which water bodies dominate the spawning reefs in western Lake Erie. Men of the geological survey want to know the influence in studies of shore erosion and bottom deposition. Water supply people along the lake have expressed interest in the study, for one source of water may be purer than another.

HONEY, We're In Luck!

Sue and I were just discussing the coming winter and how we dreaded to see it come after all our heating trouble last year. And, just like that, she said, "Be smart this year, buy Texaco Fuel from Cross Oil." Then she went on to explain that they'll give our furnace a thorough cleaning, and service the burner free all year long. Can you imagine! Then she told me about Alice and Bill running out of fuel one night about 10:30 p.m. when it was close to 20 degrees below and how fast the fuel truck arrived to re-fuel their tank, I guess they've thanked their lucky star a thousand times for Cross's Guaranteed Heating. No dear, they don't charge one cent extra. Call them? . . . I already did!
